

GUIDE TO BUYING A MALLET

When a croquet player takes up the game, they soon find that the kind of mallet they use makes a difference to their game. Most keen players decide to buy their own mallet.

More experienced players often decide to change their mallet, as their style develops, or as new and better mallets come on the market.

There are two main ways to buy a mallet – purchase a second-hand one from another croquet player, or buy one from a manufacturer of mallets. It is often difficult to find a suitable second hand mallet, though as older players retire a few come onto the market. Some mallets are advertised on the Cammeray Mallet Mart on this website. The price of a second-hand mallet can vary from $50 to $200 depending on the quality and age of the mallet.

The advantage of buying a new mallet is that most manufacturers will provide a mallet to your personal requirements – they have a range of head weights and shaft lengths so you can choose what suits you. The cost of a new mallet ranges from around $150 to over $500.

Some of the properties to look for in a mallet are:

- weight – many beginners use a mallet that is too light; if you have difficulty hitting long shots on heavy lawns, a heavier mallet will help – especially if you are not particularly strong. Typical weight range is from 2 lbs 10 ozs to 3 lbs 4 ozs – though carbon fibre mallets tend to be lighter.
- length – the right shaft length depends on your stance and style
- shaft shape – many players prefer to have hexagonal or octagonal shafts rather than round ones, as this helps them to hold the mallet at a consistent angle
- rigidity of shaft – having a rigid shaft usually provides better control, especially for stops shots
- peripheral weighting – having lead weights along the sides of the head, or shapes that put most of the material at the sides helps the mallet to swing in a straight line
- size of head – beginners may prefer a mallet with a large cross-section as this reduces the chance of hitting on the edge of the mallet, but more experienced players usually prefer a smaller cross-section
- shape of head – most modern mallets have square heads rather than round ones
- materials used – cheaper mallets are generally wood, while some of the more technically advanced ones use metal or carbon fibre
